

Why did Weiqiao pull out of the grid?

Weiqiao pulled out of the public grid in the late 1990s to run its own power plants in its own isolated, independent grid. Competitors in the aluminium industry tried to follow Weiqiao's captive model but few were able to replicate its success. Are renewables the alternative for aluminium?

Will Hongqiao move 2 million tonnes to the southwest?

China Hongqiao Group will stick to its plan of moving 2 million tonnes of capacity to the country's southwest by the end of next year despite recent electricity supply disruptions there, the world's top private aluminium producer said.

What is Shandong Weiqiao group?

The Shandong Weiqiao Group owns a complex network of small and larger captive coal plants (see map), all under the Hongqiao umbrella. Just like Hongqiao, Weiqiao is hard to pin down. Its financial structure seems intentionally complicated. Yu followed the development of Hongqiao and Weiqiao for years and says "they are trying to hide really well";

How complex is Shandong Weiqiao?

Complexity continues with Weiqiao. The Shandong Weiqiao Group owns a complex network of small and larger captive coal plants (see map), all under the Hongqiao umbrella. Just like Hongqiao, Weiqiao is hard to pin down. Its financial structure seems intentionally complicated.

Does Weiqiao still have a coal plant?

Weiqiao has retired some of its captive coal plants: 6,560MW which is nearly a third of them (1,980MW just last year). Many of the 2020 retirements were built only a few years ago, between 2010 and 2013. Yet, as of January 2021, it still operates 50 captive coal power units with a total capacity of 22.7GW, all dedicated to aluminium smelters.

Will Hongqiao move its aluminium smelters to China?

Hongqiao's relocation of aluminium smelters from its base in Shandong to China's southwest will by far be the world's biggest relocation of aluminium capacity, according to Knapp. "We are expecting 75% of our carbon footprint to be addressed through moving out of fossil-fueled electricity," added Knapp.
